A new program by nonprofit art publisher Primary Information allows you to voice your concerns to your representatives while also supporting the arts. This week, the non-profit organization launched a series of artist-made postcards, intended to transmit to politicians your messages of disappointment, outrage, or perhaps praise or even encouragement.

Each postcard costs just $1 (not including tax and shipping), and is designed to address the tumult of our times, with many directly calling out President Trump. An image by artist A.K. Burns, for instance, features the phrase “you’re fired” sculpted out of wire, attached to a pole anchored by a pale foot; Marilyn Minter’s contribution showcases the President’s infamous “Grab them by the pussy” quotation, printed in black and gold.

“Like many of our peers, we have been using random postcards to send to our local, state, and national politicians to voice our concerns,” the non-profit wrote in a press release. “We feel strongly that the images accompanying these concerns should belong to artists, and we have initiated this series to provide artists the opportunity to add their voice.”

The 13 participating artists, who also include Christine Sun Kim, Kevin Beasley, and Taub Auerbach, represent the first group to kick off what will be a monthly series. Primary Information will launch another round of postcards in mid-June “and every month thereafter for the foreseeable future,” as stated in its release.

The project is just one of many to emerge in the last few months that champions creative correspondence as a means of civic engagement, including artistic efforts to revive the more immediate transmission method of sending a fax.
